WHO'S WHO?

By C. L. G.
CHARLES J. BLUMENTHAL
When Tonopah was in its twaddling clothes and the sagebrush was still in evidence on the main street there came one evening a stranger to this desert camp in the name of Charles J. Blumenthal. He posed as a mining man and early the following morning blazed forth be-decked in a pair of No. 11 boots latched at the top with three silver buckles. "Blumie," as he was nicknamed by those who were here at that time, had purchased a mineral locating rod and for days and days could be seen walking about holding the rod in his hands, and strange to say, it usually took him in the direction where the Casino now stands. He was not fortunate in securing a valuable mineral location, and after trying for three weeks, he gave up the rod and ordered a tent from Dick Davis and located on Main street. He brought with him in his trunk several cans of sardines, crackers, peas and beans, and other grocery material that a prospector usually finds up on the old after cravering the desert. He was joined by a man and a dog, a woman, whose name was "Mrs. Brown Stone." As a prospector Blumenthal made good. He knew how to charge for his wares. He never held a bargain sale and sold whiskey at that time for $2 a gallon. Business flourished. It was better than ever, and he struck an electric light in his store. After a few years he was able to retire. At one time when the barber theatre heralded a troupe of stars, it was said that Blumenthal had purchased an interest in the concern, as he could be found in the front row each evening, and the troupe played the same show every night. He still wears smoked glasses caused by the glare of the footlights.
About two years ago Blumenthal ran across the old mineral finding rod and one afternoon walked out to the Archaical district to try his luck again. He was successful this time, and today is one of the richest stockholders in the Archaical Mining company. He is still active, although nearly 86 years of age and can be found at his desk each day figuring percentages.
